

CLOUD capitalizes on geothermal reservoirs known to be underneath the surface of Copenhagen. To date, these reservoirs are not used to generate energy since temperatures are not hot enough. However, research being conducted by Rice University in Houston, Texas has discovered a new way to lower the boiling temperature of water by using carbon nanoparticles. These particles, when excited are able to bring even icy water to a boil.

